

His captivating memoirs describe his escape from Austria in 1938, and how he then practiced medicine — in fantastic succession — on a notorious street in Paris, at an Ivory Coast clinic, a French prison camp (where the choicest pâté and nothing else was served three times a day), and at long last, in New York. There he delivered everything from groceries to kittens — before he finally became a doctor-with-a-country.

Three short episodes from this book have appeared in The New Yorker.
